Axios large files. Axios large file download. Axios post large file. Axios large file upload. Axios send large files.

Clicking the "Submit" button would send a POST request to the /update-profile endpoint of our server. Multipart/Form-Data is one of the encoding types that allows files to be included in your form data before it's transferred to the server for processing. However - we can override this default behavior by attaching an event listener to the button, and preventing the default events! Again, sending Axios requests entails asynchronicity - and we can alter our headers and otherwise customize the request before sending it out. The choice is fully on you. There are a couple of ways you can do this, with no clear or distinct "winner" - they're functionally equivalent per request in the end. Other encoding types can be used to achieve non-file transfers: application/x-www-form-urlencoded - Encodes data as a query string - separating key-value pairs (assigned with =), with symbols such as &. To use Express - we'll want to install it via npm. We've then explored how to set the enctype with Axios - a popular asynchronous HTTP library, and send POST requests containing multipart/file data. text/plain - It sends data as plain text (without encoding) and is mostly used for debugging, not production. In this guide, we'll take a look at how to asynchronously send files and other form data with Axios to a Node.js (Express) server, as well as how to receive this data in the backend for processing. For simple file upload handling with Express, we can utilize the express-fileupload middleware, which is also easily installed via npm: npm install express express-fileupload Now, let's start up a server and define an endpoint that accepts our POST request to /update-profile: const express = require("express"); var fileupload = require("express-fileupload"); const app = express(); app.use(fileupload()); app.use(express.urlencoded({ extended: true })); app.post("/update-profile", (req, res) => { let username = req.body.username; let = req.files.userPicture; res.send(` Your username is: ${username} Uploaded image name is: ${userPicture.name} `); }); app.listen(5000, () => { console.log("Server started on port 5000"); }); The request (req) passed to the request handler contains the data sent by our form. Now - let's define the endpoint that receives this request and processes it. Any and all files will be located under the files field of the req object! We can thus access the input username via req.body.username, and the uploaded file via req.files.userPicture! Check out our hands-on, practical guide to learning Git, with best-practices, industry-accepted standards, and included cheat sheet. Awesome! When the form is filled, and the "Submit" button is clicked - the request is forwarded to the endpoint, with support for uploading files. Stop Googling Git commands and actually learn it!When we submit the form via our HTML page, a request is sent to this API, and we receive the following response in our browser console: Your username is: NAME_YOU_ENTERED Uploaded image name is: UPLOADED_FILE_NAME Additionally, if we log the req.files.userPicture itself to the console, it returns all of the information about our file, such as the file name, encoding type, and other information related to the file. Alternatively, you can define the type for each individual request, by altering the headers: axios.post("/path/to/api", data, { headers: { "Content-Type": "multipart/form-data", }, }); Or you can just set the enctype attribute in the tag of a specific form, and Axios will simply adopt that form's encoding type: Axios + Express For our example, we will create a simple form with two inputs, one for the user to submit their name and the other for them to select a profile image: Type = "Text" Name = "UserName" Placeholder = "Enter Name" /> Submit Setting the enctype with Axios and HTML To send multipart data (files) through form data - you'll have to set the encoding type. type.
